the 1990s, the number of people in the UK who are employed in the public sector has increased by 1.5 million (1990–1999) (Department of Health 2000).

There is a growing emphasis on the importance of the public sector in the provision of health care services, and the need to ensure that the public sector is able to meet the needs of the population. This has led to a number of initiatives aimed at improving the efficiency and effectiveness of the public sector, including the introduction of the Health Service Act 1999 and the establishment of the National Health Service (NHS) Commission.

The NHS Commission is responsible for ensuring that the NHS is able to meet the needs of the population, and for ensuring that the NHS is able to provide a high quality of care. The Commission is also responsible for ensuring that the NHS is able to meet the needs of the population in a cost-effective manner.

The Commission is also responsible for ensuring that the NHS is able to meet the needs of the population in a sustainable manner. This means that the NHS must be able to provide a high quality of care for the population in the long term, without incurring excessive costs.

The Commission is also responsible for ensuring that the NHS is able to meet the needs of the population in a fair manner. This means that the NHS must be able to provide a high quality of care to all members of the population, regardless of their social or economic status.

The Commission is also responsible for ensuring that the NHS is able to meet the needs of the population in a timely manner. This means that the NHS must be able to provide a high quality of care to the population as soon as they need it.

The Commission is also responsible for ensuring that the NHS is able to meet the needs of the population in a safe manner. This means that the NHS must be able to provide a high quality of care to the population without causing any harm to them.

The Commission is also responsible for ensuring that the NHS is able to meet the needs of the population in a secure manner. This means that the NHS must be able to provide a high quality of care to the population without being vulnerable to any threats to its security.

The Commission is also responsible for ensuring that the NHS is able to meet the needs of the population in a transparent manner. This means that the NHS must be able to provide a high quality of care to the population without any hidden costs or hidden agendas.

The Commission is also responsible for ensuring that the NHS is able to meet the needs of the population in a accountable manner. This means that the NHS must be able to provide a high quality of care to the population without any excuses or excuses.

The Commission is also responsible for ensuring that the NHS is able to meet the needs of the population in a responsible manner. This means that the NHS must be able to provide a high quality of care to the population without any irresponsible behaviour or irresponsible decisions.
